Work History

January 2010 - Present

Journalist, The Daily Paragraph, London

Working for this massive broadsheet publication I was responsible for the entertainment and social sections, and I would have to provide up to date, on the pulse reports from the showbiz and current events markets. This entailed having a close relationship with many large celebrities and their agencies, as well as being well connected with photographers and independent leads.

January 2008- January 2010

Journalist, Freelance, London.

I worked for myself during a period of reflection from mass media. I had to try and keep one step ahead of events by following celebrity blogs and websites to try and make sure when a development occurred I would be the first to know about it, and could report it first. I used my many media contacts to get my work published, and my many photographic colleagues provided images to go with the reports.

Journalist, The Daily Page, London

Working for a large tabloid in the readers concerns section it was my job to follow up on reports that members of the public would write in with, and see if there is a story to tell. This could be a community interest story, a whistle blowing, or even just a general grumble about something. I made stories from the letters we were sent based on investigative journalism.
